Information Technology Day

The idea for this event came from Target who has successfully held others in different universities.

It is formatted as a student-driven event. They will have a panel consisting of company representatives. The panelists will answer questions coming from the students and students will be encouraging or discouraging the topic by raising their cards: red (don't pursue) or green(keep going).

It's somewhat similar to Reddit but deliberately low-tech to be free from hashtags etc.

The panel discussion will run for the first hour and the second hour will be round-table discussions on topics students choose. They will play it by the ear and let students shape the event.
